biochemical and immunological data suggest that the two subtypes of the disease are distinct entities and that the clinical picture may be determined by the relative contribution of each subtype. In this study, the two subtypes were distinguished by the presence of IgG anti-CCP in the serum of patients with RA. The prevalence of IgG anti-CCP was 100% in the patients with RA, 100% in the patients with SLE, and 0% in the healthy controls. The prevalence of IgG anti-CCP was 100% in the patients with RA, 100% in the patients with SLE, and 0% in the healthy controls.
